Hi Chad!

Thanks for letting me fix that tiny discrepancy.
I'm about to start deeming your app right now and I FWD your email to my boss, I'm thinking it can go on the agenda for March in public comment?
She will let me know. Let me know if there's anything else I can do for you, and fingers crossed that the next email you get from me will be your completion notice and board date!

Thanks,

Subject: Re: 26946- Mj-04

Randi,

Thanks for the good talk today, and yes I am ok with you making that change for me from 500sq ft to not exceed 499 sq ft.

As for the importation of outside marijuana product.

I believe for Alaska to protect the interest of Alaskans, and especially the interest of small craft cultivations and small scale cultivations the state would need to implement restrictions or taxes to protect the cultivations of the state. My thought is that any cultivation or retail would not be able to directly access marijuana products from out of state. That would protect the cultivators and the manufactures from having to compete with out of state marijuana. It is costly and would ultimately be very prohibitive for Alaskan cultivations to compete with marijuana from Oregon, Washington and California.

Now the State of Alaska has a thriving black market for concentrates currently. This is due in part to extremely high cultivation taxes on flower, and lower quality trim. But these taxes could be offset by allowing manufacturers to procure flower from out of state for a much lower price, the outdoor marijuana produced in Eastern Oregon, Washington and Northern California, for manufacturing. By allowing only the Manufacturers to buy from out of state, this would drive prices down in the Alaskan retail concentrate market and really drive the current black market out of business. The thought is manufacturers could then use flower for production and increase overall yields to counter the extreme costs of the taxes in the state of Alaska. It's just a thought, but I know Brandon Emmitt has discussed the growth and size of the black market and the need to combat the black market in Alaska. By only allowing concentrates licenses the ability to procure product for manufacturing the cost of production should go down, and that should pass on the customer in the form of a better product for a lower retail price. This in turn should compete with or beat current black market prices of $40 a gram for product you see in retail shops for $60-80 a gram. Only allowing manufacturing licenses to deal out of state would also protect cultivations and retails from being flooded by "Corporate" marijuana from corporations who have product and brands in the lower 48. As we move closer to legalization federally, the corporate giants are eagerly waiting, but if we let, say Coors, or RJ Reynolds, or large corporate MJ shops from Washington or California start buying up licenses in Alaska and then shipping product from their operations in the lower 48 because it is cheaper to produce flower and other products. Well that could really hurt the small cannabis cultivators and even some of the larger cultivators and retailers. Competition is great, but Alaska has challenges with logistics and Alaskans money would flow out of the state if the board or legislator doesn't protect Alaskan business owners a little.

Well those are my thoughts, Just thought I would pass them on

Chad Ragsdale

Hi Chad!

With your permission, I'd like to change 1 small detail on your MJ-04, per our conversation your cultivation will not exceed 499 feet. Your application reads "500 ft"
Just reply with "Yes" and I will make that minor change.

Also, I asked my boss about the ban on importation, and she said to have you email me your thoughts and ideas and we can give that to the board for their consideration.
I don't think it's something that will happen immediately, and of course it's ultimately up to the board if they want to take action, but if you don't ask, the answer is always no!
It's something they can at least get on their radar, so when legalization comes and regulations need to be written, it can be available for their consideration.

Please let me know if I'm good to change that detail on the MJ-04 and I'll get you taken care of ASAP.

Have a great day!

Thanks,

Randi Baker
