Re: Written Letter for Recreational Statement

Dear Alaska Alcohol Beverage Control Board:

1. Hours of operation vary from game times @ 1p to 8p and continue to prior the end of games.
2. Our recreation event is baseball.
3. The season runs from April through August.

Here is some reasons why we serve and a little history. In fact, there are few drinking traditions in America as time honored as sipping a cold one while cheering on the home team and have even built into the game a pause, the seventh inning stretch, to refuel at the snack stand.

Take Me Out to the Ballgame is as close to a national drinking song as we have in this country—especially Harry Caray's legendary singalong rendition at Wrigley Field.

The connection between the two American pastimes isn't a coincidence, and actually goes back to the early days of the sport.

A number of the league's teams were owned by beer barons at some point in their histories. Jacob Ruppert, whose eponymous family brewery stretched over a large swath of New York's Upper East Side and a four-term Congressman, bought the Yankees in 1915 and was the man who engineered the acquisition of star slugger Babe Ruth from his Boston rivals—in addition to winning seven World Series titles and building Yankee Stadium.

The St. Louis Cardinals were owned by Anheuser-Busch and the Toronto Blue Jays and the Baltimore Orioles also had ties to large beer brands. That's not to mention the Milwaukee Brewers who, of course, honor the city's beer industry, including the team's mascot Bernie Brewer.

While Ty Cobb, who was a notoriously tough person and a tenacious player, didn't drink for enjoyment, he did so as a means to stay strong and prevent what he called "staleness."

According to Fullerton and Cobb this was a pretty common belief in the big leagues, which was shared by stars including Christy Mathewson and Grover Alexander. "Good beer and ale were fine for ball players, taken in moderation, when they were going stale, and staleness is the most dangerous thing baseball players have to contend with," said Cobb.

Thank you for considering our renewal for out recreational license.

Regards,

Denise M. Christopher
