Case# AM19-0129

Hello AMCO,

I am writing this email because it has been recommended by you that I respond in writing to a Notice of Violation.

The notice of the alleged violation was delivered to me a week prior to this correspondence.

It has been brought to my attention that I violated the law when I took it upon myself to correct a clerical error that was discovered immediately after receiving a shipment from a concentrate producer.

The concentrate company sent me a shipment that stated its products' weights as grams, and not shipped as units. This company produces half gram units and accidentally mistook converting the weight. This resulted in my company virtually accepting twice the amount of actual shipped weight. This happened late afternoon on a Sunday. As soon as I started to move the inventory into my POS system the mistake was discovered and I contacted the shipping company to remedy this clerical issue.

The known industry solve for this type of mistake is to "virtually" transfer the weight back to the originator, have it adjusted, and then resend the units "Virtually" back to its destination.

The solve seemed to be an extremely legit and legal way to fix this clerical error. Being that it was late on a Sunday night and that a reasonable fix for this issue had presented itself by a more experienced licensee I decided to take part in resolving my inventory imbalance.

I never one time considered this to be " Backflow". The inventory that was sent back was virtually created and never actually existed. Surely the intent of the law means that I can't physically send products to a concentrate factory from my retail, I understand this and would never break the law to do it. I understand the chain of custody and directional flow of product and always follow the laws stating such.

In good faith this incident was self reported by the participating licensee to include the AMCO with this ever so common industry issue and METRC's know solve for it.

Disregarding any of my thoughts aforementioned, I wont be participating in any "virtual" transfers ever again without written consent by the board or until the law is more defined in doing so.

in best regards,

Ryan K. Hall
